Sometimes the names of men become so allied with the business which they pursue as to make the vocation and cognomen inseparable. You cannot mention one without thinking at the same moment of the other. This is notably the case with P. T. BARNUM, more so, perhaps, than with any other man living, no matter what the occupation, nor how long the individual has industriously followed it. Barnum was the first to build up and successfully conduct an immense museum in America, or elsewhere for that matter, and as originality always receives the amount of encouragement due it, just in proportion to its deserts, so Mr. Barnum succeeded, and with one bound sprang on the top round of the ladder of fame. Without money, and against the advice of his friends, he accomplished all this. He knew that his idea had in it the germ of success. He was simply in advance of others. Had he followed the counsel of his intimates and abandoned the project which to him uncovered all the elements of successful accomplishment and a brilliant career, some one else years later on would have carried it out, and there would have been no Barnum, the showman. He paid $25,000 for an old museum with its figures and stuffed attractions, when it was worthless to anyone else, and in six months had his money back. New life was infused into all things round and about the establishment, and an appearance of animation and prosperity prevailed everywhere. The museum became literally Barnum, and without Barnum the museum could not have lived one month. His first move was to introduce living curiosities, such as little people, fat men and women, men actually skin and bone, giant, and so on, without limit. Now every large town in the country has its museum, and all of them give exactly the show Barnum presented in New York forty-five years ago, except that they are not one-tenth as complete and extensive. The great manager was the first, the greatest and best of all. He blazed the road, to use woodman phraseology, and many men have traveled it since, some with success, others with failure.

When Mr. Barnum exhibited the first dwarf, Tom Thumb, the whole nation's head was turned topsy-turvy. The little General and the great manager became the most noted personages, not only in this country but abroad. Mr. Barnum could not resist the importunities of foreign influence, and finally crossed the Atlantic with his midget man. Kings, Queens, and noted men and women of the most fashionable and popular European capitals paid homage to the dwarf and praised and feasted the great showman. After the Tom Thumb victory at home and in the old world, Mr. Barnum engaged at an unheard of salary, the famous and beautiful voiced "Swedish Nightingale," the incomparable Jenny Lind. The queen of song got rich in less than a year, so did Barnum, who was wealthy already. Then the great showman built the enormous New American Museum on Broadway, in New York, afterwards destroyed by fire. In 1870 he again appeared with the "World's Fair," the first of his big traveling shows. 1874 gave the metropolis his Hippodrome, which was presented with the glory and splendor of the Tarquin and Cæsar eras. Since then, every year has been only a succeeding and unheard of triumph, and now he throws a cloud over every other achievement of the past by breaking England's heart, and giving us—Jumbo, the

The Life of P. T. Barnum, written by himself, and brought down to the present day, reads like a romance. Over a million copies have been circulated in this and foreign countries. It abounds in valuable experiences and suggestions, while its wit and humor are irresistible. No person should fail to read and own a copy of it.

It is neatly bound, full of pictures, and sold at exact cost, 50 cents.
